To a strap reaching down as far as the abdomen are attached, first, the breast-plate with a St. Andrew s cross and pendants, and then below this, a great four-cornered medallion with an elliptical one on either side, and at the very bottom a large square one. There is a cuff on the right wrist and on the left one a large four-cornered medallion, which may be regarded as a little shield for the protection of the artery of the wrist. The head-covering consists of confused scroll-work out of which rises a great plume of feathers falling backwards. These feathers are toothed like a saw, and have rayless stars and feather tassels at their tips. The divinity rests his left hand upon his hip. In his well-modelled right hand he holds a lance, the shaft of which is ornamented with small...
