Ampere-hours required to produce free gassing of a lead battery at the normal starting rate of charge will be approximately 90 per cent of the Ampere-hours previously discharged. At this point the current should be cut down to the finishing rate and the charge continued until the battery begins to gas freely again. In order to obtain most efficient results with batteries of the lead-acid type, the voltage of the charging circuit should not exceed approximately 2.5 volts per cell at normal temperatures with current flowing at one-half the value of the finishing rate at ordinary temperatures. When the voltage of the circuit exceeds this value, the maximum resistance of the rheostat must be sufficient F10. 3o.--Battery-charging circuit, constant-current method NOTE.--- A=ammeter, numerals indicate range. I=voltmeter, range to suit system. to permit of a reduction in voltage to this value. It is desirable that...
